deserted by the enemy, and would speedily follow us. When the last of the flying enemy had halted in the friendly forest shade we stopped also. Waiting for the rest of the troops to come up, we re-formed to pass sections through the woods. Some field pieces and a howitzer were hauled up, with infinite difficulty, to protect the head of the column. The Fifteenth Regiment of regulars joined us, taking the P. lead, which imparted more encouragement to the militiamen. We now pushed on in the direction of the fort. The enemy gave us an arduous time in doing it, though not by opposing arms. We encountered a couple of streams ever which they had, with solicitous forethought removed the bridges. At last we came into a clearing, the fort lying just
